Television and film adaptations Tarzan is a frequent protagonist of comic strips, comic books, cartoons and television series, for example Tarzan and His Mate. In all media, the name "Tarzan" is frequently shortened to just "Tarzan". A Tarzan film appeared as a "Tarzan of the Apes" cartoon in 1934. There were three Tarzan theatrical features between 1937 and 1939 and Tarzan the Ape Man was released in 1948. The first Tarzan feature film, Tarzan the Ape Man (1934), was directed by David Hand. It was a hybrid of two parts of the MGM movie serial series, where the sound-effect shots of Tarzan were spliced into the silent-film sequences. The original version, thought lost, was later re-released in Europe as a color film. Following a major court battle, the studio was allowed to re-release the film in the U.S. as a black and white film in 1966. In a second feature film, Tarzan and His Mate (1939), Lionel Barrymore portrayed Tarzan and Ann Dvorak played Jane. The action film Tarzan's New York Adventure (1942) featured John Derek as Tarzan and Lucille Ball as Jane. The third feature film, Tarzan and His Mate (1947), was directed by William Beaudine and starred Van Johnson as Tarzan and Loretta Young as Jane. Tarzan and the Lost Empire (1951) was a Walt Disney Studios production. It was directed by Hamilton Luske. The film is loosely based on John Collier's book and includes many changes to the character, including the conversion of Jane into a gold-skinned white woman named Jane. 82157476af
